5. In a few words, share your over-all impression of this session.

- As a non-teaching staff member I knew it wouldn't necessarily help with my job. But it was fascinating to sit with the STEM instructors and to hear them brainstorm ways to implement UDL practices when they have binary right and wrong answers they need from students. Great session!
- Great presentation.
- Great presentation!
- I appreciated the plug to remove barriers for contingent faculty in even knowing about school programs, etc.
- I did feel a bit stuck and think I'd have liked more structured workshops.
- Once again, interactive and inspiring.
- Revealed a better understanding of what organizational change involves.
- Sees administrative and service folk as real teachers. Challenges our web formats.
- The intimate setting with only one table-worth of folks getting a good conversation with realistic strategies and sage wisdom from Dr. Tobin was truly a once-in-a-lifetime mentorship opportunity. I feel like I have a lot of new strategies and general reinvigoration, along with great allies to help proliferate UDL beyond just my own classroom, to others' classrooms, and to other areas of the college.
- The speaker is knowledgeable but distracting in his own way. I can't put my finger on what about it was off-putting but he was slightly off-putting.
- This one drilled down a bit and was very applicable.
- This session was extremely informative on offering various ways to make my courses more accessible for students.
- This session was meaningful and informative. I enjoyed hearing how others are working with different areas of accessibility and curriculum design.
- This was a jam-packed masterclass in how to deliver an interactive, engaging presentation. It has so many embedded layers of UDL, active learning, and other best-practice things, with very low-hanging fruit that anyone can adopt, along with deep things that only master-practitioners of UDL would pick up on. Truly an excellently planned and executed session.
- Tom covered many 'basics' that are personally affirming to me and inspiring.
- Very engaging and good at putting it into practice live.
